how to make someone fall in love with you: can you control who you can fall in love?, how to know if you love someone? you may know but you may not understand by ROBERT I LIZER ISBN B00XZKECYW

“Love, love, love, what is it good for? Absolutely nothing” some might say, but we all know that’s not true. There are plenty of reasons to go out and seek the butterflies inducing feeling in spite of the relatively high chance that you might end up disappointed or brokenhearted in the end. Finding love is often a pretty complicated process, but what if it doesn’t have to be? What if you can make someone fall in love with you just by, I don't know, asking him or her a set seemingly ordinary questions? As unlikely as that may sound, a psychological experiment first conducted more than 20 years ago suggests that it's not only possible, but actually pretty much guaranteed to work if done correctly.

The said experiment came from the mind of psychologist Arthur Aron and works by using a very basic tried-and-true principle. Before going any further I do have to mention that this method likely does not work for people who believe in love at first sight or over the internet (sorry) given that you will need to sit down and have a lengthy and intimate conversation with the person you're interested in if you want to replicate the experiment. So, how do you make someone fall in love with you? Just ask a series of 36 questions then stare into each other's eyes for a few minutes and they should be all yours according to the experiment.

As you might imagine, these are not just any old questions, so let's elaborate a bit here. The questions are split into three different sets, with each set working on building up intimacy, trust and disclosure as you progress. The first set mostly includes questions that fall into the small talk category, so you will have to get until the end of the "interrogation" if you're really serious about making someone fall in love with you. By the time you get to the third set of questions, you'll be stepping into the territory of dark secrets and hidden desires, at which point you'll know that you're on the right track. The point behind this inquiry should be pretty obvious by now. People who are very open to each other and willing to leave themselves vulnerable are much more likely fall in love.

You will be able to find the questions at the bottom of this article, but before you try and trick your love interest into becoming a guinea pig for your questionable psychological experiments, there are a few things you should know. After the two of you are done with the questions, doctor Aron suggests that the parties involved must quietly stare into each other's eyes for a period of about four minutes, although two minutes might also do the trick from what I hear. Also, it would actually be pretty difficult to trick someone into this experiment because both people need to be aware of what's going on. Specifically, you and your partner need to be asking each other the questions one at a time in the given order and you must also reply to them as honestly as you can. I know, the jig is up and all evil plans fly out the window at this point.

Now, I haven't tried this myself, but if you head over to The New York Times you'll find the confessions of many people who apparently did try out the experiment and they swear it worked like a charm. It's also worth mentioning that according to the experiment, not only will your partner fall in love with you, but you will also fall in love with them, so just keep that in mind. With that out of the way, you'll find the 36 questions below. Knock your self out and make sure you come back and tell us all about your results in the comments section. But just in case it doesn't work, don't worry because real love potions should be making their way to a drugstore near you at some point in the not too distant future.
