Isn't it that when you're in love, cakes begin to be filled with all the things you could possibly know of? Things such as sweetness, softness, lightness, bitterness, and depth?

The third daughter of a mill owner, Sam Soon is a pâtissier who aspires to bake cakes that are as delicious as her father's rice cakes. She's the kind of a woman who despite feeling restless and heart broken would wake up at dawn, stand in front of the oven, and bake sweet-smelling bread. She's relieved and amazed that her heart has not turned stone cold yet in spite of her heartaches and sadness.

Meanwhile, Do Yeong is the worst guy to be on a blind date with. Although he's a good piano player and a good kisser, he's a pessimist when it comes to love.

He thinks he'll never be happy again after his brother died and his first love left him (although he still patiently waits for the latter's return).

After a chance encounter, Sam Soon and Do Yeong end up working together and striking an unlikely deal that involves him pretending to be her date. He's far from being attracted to her while she can't stand him. But why does Do Yeong feel totally uneasy whenever Sam Soon's not around?

Read through the pages and fill your appetite with Sam Soon's tasty tale of love and misadventures.
